a map-making ttrpg where 4 disparate worlds (think different genres) with their own maps come together and have to interact/coexist with one another. you make 4 separate maps in phase 1, then you put a quadrant from each together and resolve arguments in phase 2

“kitbashing”

2 games in the game - a MAP-MAKING game and a CONFLICT RESOLUTION game (probably involves changing/adding to the maps as well)

map-making game should encourage different genres

- american western, alien planet, prehistoric, etc.
- should “genre” be systemized? or should the game just encourage players to be creative insp: the quiet year of course

phase 1 - before the Rift hearts/diamonds - build your town prompts focused on drawing as many things as possible OR establishing truths about the people who live there prompts are open-ended BUT perhaps guide you to use all 4 corners of the paper? (ideally the people playing this are good sports and would do so anyways, but this could help prevent them from cheesing it)

interstitial - the Rift tear your paper into quadrants. (using a d4?) choose 1 quadrant to keep and discard the other 3

phase 2 - after the Rift clubs/spades - hash things out prompts focused on inter-society conflict (i.e. only one person’s food source is viable anymore, how do the other people react?)

maybe a formalized “discussion” system?

SO deck of cards

hearts - what is the town like societally?

diamonds - build a new thing!

clubs - what is the new town like societally?

spades - build a new thing!

this might be wildly unbalanced, perhaps needs more drawing prompts, 13 of each may not be enough